

Who Am I?

A variation of a party game which should help to build team work and communication skills - whilst also having a good laugh!

How?

This activity is a cross over between 'charades' and 'articulate' and is a great way to get teams working together and communicating well.

Before you can start the activity, you will need some names of famous people on small slips of paper. Ideally you need about 30 names to play. Either write the names yourself beforehand or get the young people to write a couple each before starting.

Split your young people into even teams. 2-4 teams is ideal.

There are three rounds to the activity. In each round one person will pick out names from the bowl and try to get their team to guess correctly. One team should go at a time, with each team having 30 seconds a go, before passing to the next team. Keep giving teams 30 seconds each, until all the names have gone from the bowl. You can only pass on a name once per go. A team gets one point per correct guess.

Round 1 - Talking Round - You can describe the famous person to your team using words only. You cannot say the persons name or what it sounds like though.

Round 2 - One Word Round - For round two you will need to put the same names from round one into the bowl, but this time you can only say one word (and you can't change that word during your go, once you've said it).

Round 3 - Acting - Using the same names again you need to act out the famous name without speaking or making any noises.

A round only finishes once all the names have been guessed correctly. The rounds should get harder as you go through the activity, but as the names remain the same, this should help. The winning team is the team with the most points after all three rounds.
